SATURDAY EVENING, AUGUST 31, 1878.

Give me the Lower Berth.

The evening of the third day of the case an intoxicated man, smelling like a horse blanket, and carrying a dyspeptic carpetbag, stopped a street-car, and stumbled in. It was one of those summer cars, with canvas back curtains, one of those refrigerator cars, that makes cold chills run up your trousers' legs to look at them. A colored barber was standing on the back platform, and the intoxicated man hauled his carpetbag to him and went in, reeling up to the corner as though he were looking for something. "Gimme lower berth in the middle," said he to the colored man, as he felt around in the corner for the door knob to the drinking fountain. The colored man laughed and told the man to take a seat in the middle of the car. There were only a few people in the car—an old man going to the depot, a young couple coming home from a picnic, and an old maid going to the Lord only knows where. The drunken man, who was evidently from the country in attendance upon the pool-table, pulled out his boots and said, "Ain't you going to make up my berth?" The old maid took out her smelling bottle and acted as though she was going to faint. His stockings were old enough to vote, and his feet would have been condemned by the board of health. He pulled off his coat and tried to hang his hat on the bell cord, when the driver saw him, and leaving the mules, he came in and took the man by the shoulder and said, "None of that boss." The man, who evidently imagined he was behind the curtains of a sleeper, said, "Hear you, (singing) I want to be woken up at Camp Day, sure," and he began to make preliminary movements towards taking off his pants. Sliding his suspenders over his shoulders, his hand had just reached his waistband, when a scream struck him dumb, and the old maid pulled the bell strap, and as the car started up, she jumped off, yelling for a policeman. The driver reasoned with the man, told him he was on a street car, and got his clothes on and pointed out the depot to him. He took his carpetbag and went off, with one boot in his hand, trying to button up his vest with the other hand, he muttered: "If that old woman had kept her curtain pulled down, wouldn't have been any (trite) about it all." And he wandered off into the night. —Millwaukee Sun.
